Payment of foreign money liabilities

Motion for a recommendation

tabled by Sir Knox CUNNINGHAM and other members of the Assembly

The Assembly,

Considering that the aim of the Council of Europe is to be pursued by agreements and common action, inter alia in legal and administrative matters ;

Recalling that the Committee of Ministers has decided " to consider the possibility of giving effect, in the framework of the Council of Europe, to appropriate suggestions and proposals of the specialised international organisations already working in the legal field ", including the International Law Association (Doc. 238, para 86);

Considering that this Association has prepared a draft Convention on the Payment of Foreign Money Liabilities, a copy of which is attached hereto,

Recommends to the Committee of Ministers that it should invite Member Governments to sign the said Convention, possibly after examination by a committee of experts convened within the framework of the Council of Europe.

Draft Convention

Introductory

1. The purpose of the following Articles is to ensure that, if a sum of money shall be paid in a country the currency of which differs from that in which the sum of money is expressed, the creditor shall receive neither more nor less than he would receive if payment were made at the due place and date in the currency in which the sum of money is expressed.
2. When incorporating the provisions of the following Articles into their respective substantive and procedural laws, Contracting States shall be at liberty so to adapt the wording of the Articles as to achieve the said purpose most effectively within the framework of their respective legal systems.

Payment

1. Article 1. If a sum of money is due in a currency which is not that of the place of payment, such sum may, unless a different intention appears, be paid in the currency of the place of payment.
2. Article 2. If the debtor alleges that it is impossible for him to pay the sum of money due in a currency which is not that of the place of payment and if the debtor does not exercise the right conferred by Article 1, the creditor may require payment in the currency of the place of payment.
3. Article 3. If, in accordance with Articles 1 or 2, the debtor pays in the currency of the place of payment, the conversion shall be effected in accordance with the rate of exchange at the place and date of payment.
4. Article 4. If the debtor does not pay at the date of maturity, and if after such date the currency in which the sum of money is due depreciates in relation to the currency of the place of payment, the debtor, whether he pays in the currency due or in the currency of the place of payment as provided in the preceding Articles, shall pay an additional amount equivalent to the difference between the rate of exchange at the date of maturity and the date of payment, unless the debtor shall prove that his failure to pay results from 'force-majeure' or default of the creditor or that the creditor has not suffered any damage resulting from the delay.
5. Article 5. The preceding rules are without prejudice to the right, if any, of a party to claim from the other party such further or other damage or relief as the applicable law may justify.

Proceedings

1. Article 6. In case of proceedings instituted to recover a sum of money expressed in a currency which is different from that of the forum, the creditor shall claim the sum of money so expressed and shall be entitled to claim also amounts due to him under Articles 2-5 in respect of the period up to the date of judgment.
2. Article 7. If and in so far as the Court gives judgment or makes an order in favour of the plaintiff, the judgment or order shall be for a sum of money as claimed in accordance with the preceding Article. It shall be open to the law of the forum to provide that the Court shall give the debtor the option to pay the equivalent at the rate of exchange prevailing in the country of the forum at the date of actual payment.
3. Article 8. In the event of the depreciation, between the date of judgment and satisfaction of the judgment, of the currency in which the sum of money is due in relation to the currency of the forum, the provisions of Article 4 shall apply and the judgment shall not preclude the creditor from pursuing the claim so arising.

General

1. Article 9. The application of the preceding rules shall extend to all monetary liabilities irrespective of whether they were originally expressed in money or not.
2. Article 10. The place of payment referred to in the preceding Articles shall be the place where payment is due.

3. Article 11. Subject to any different intentions of the parties, the rate of exchange referred to in the preceding Articles shall be the rate ordinarily and legitimately used for commercial transactions or for the particular type of transaction in question at the place of payment or, in default thereof, at such other place as may be reasonable in the circumstances or, in default thereof, such rate of conversion as may be reasonable in the circumstances.

Report on the draft Convention prepared by the International Law Association

1. The question of the payment of liabilities expressed in foreign money engaged the attention of the 34th Conference of the International Law Association held in Vienna precisely thirty years ago (see Proceedings of the 34th Conference p. 543 sqq.). The Report rendered by the Rate of Exchange Committee (as it was then called) and the discussion in Vienna under the chairmanship of M. Leopold Dor, whom we are privileged to welcome as a member of our Committee, resulted in the adoption of the " Vienna Rules ". They have remained a dead letter. This is mainly due to the fact that they were intended to be voluntarily adopted by contracting parties (see Report of the 34th Conference pp. 565, 566 and passim) and were not put forward with the object of being jus cogens. No contract has become known to us in which they were in fact adopted. Moreover, shortly after their adoption the Vienna Rules were subjected to weighty criticism, particularly by so great an authority as Arthur Nussbaum (Vertraglicher Schutz gegen Schwankungen des Geldwertes (1928), p. 65 sqq.). In the light of later experience it has become obvious that the study of the subject, begun in 1926, has to be continued with a view to finding a solution of the numerous problems which, as a result of monetary disturbances in many countries, have arisen in practice. For these reasons we felt it necessary and fitting to devote two meetings held in Strasbourg in May 1955, and in May 1956, to a renewed investigation of the subject.

2. We have, however, not found it necessary to spend much time upon the elucidation of the practice as developed by the courts of the principal countries of the world. The material has been collected, analysed and compared by a number of authors. We have drawn upon, but do not propose to re-state, the results reached by these contributions.

3. The decisions and the literature which we have studied have led us to reach one conclusion of paramount importance, which decisively influenced our work. Although the practice of the various countries differs in many points of detail, there exists a very large measure of uniformity of regulations and an almost complete identity in legal policy. It follows that the subject does not give rise to many grave problems of policy. To a considerable extent it is of an almost technical and uncontroversial character. The further consequence is that it lends itself pre-eminently to unifying legislation.

4. In these circumstances we have seen our task to be one of laying the foundations for a Convention which, if adopted by States, will eliminate such differences as now exist and are annoying rather than fundamental, and which, at the same time, incorporates so much of the practice common to almost all countries as to stand a chance of being in fact adopted by many of them. Our decision to take this course was facilitated by the encouragement given to us by certain of the organisations which are in charge of unifying legislation: we have some reason to think that, if the International Law Association produces a practicable text of a draft convention, this will stimulate action with a view to having some such convention accepted by States.

5. After these introductory remarks we propose to comment shortly upon the provisions included in our draft Convention. We shall confine ourselves to indicating the broad ideas underlying them and shall, in particular, deal with the suggestions and criticism which some of the branches have been good enough to make and which to some extent have led us to reformulate the 1955 Draft and to submit a revised Draft scheduled hereto in English and in a French translation.

6. The payment of foreign money liabilities requires consideration from two points of view. In the first place there arises the question of the parties' rights and duties independently of proceedings. Secondly, we shall have to deal with the influence of the institution of proceedings upon the rules of substantive law which are normally applicable. Our draft Convention, therefore, is divided into two main parts headed " Payment " and " Proceedings " respectively. We may say at once that it is our view that the rules applicable in the case of proceedings should be so framed as to ensure that the amount payable under the judgment will be neither more nor less than the amount due in the absence of a judgment. In a third part we suggest certain rules of a general character, which are intended to apply to both the preceding parts.

7. Experience has shown that differences of legal conceptions and difficulties of translation have frequently delayed or prevented the adoption of uniform legislation, inasmuch as States were reluctant to introduce into their own law the specific text of a convention. We have, therefore, thought it advisable to preface our draft Convention by an introduction which, on the one hand, defines its overriding purpose and, on the other hand, allows liberty to alter the formulation if this is necessary to achieve that purpose.

8. Article 1 expresses a rule which may fairly be said to be of universal application: normally it is open to the debtor to discharge his obligation by paying in the currency of the place of payment. Thus an American debtor who owes sterling in Geneva may, at his option, pay either sterling or Swiss francs. This does not apply where a different intention appears, e.g. in the case of what in certain countries is known as an effective clause.

9. However, it may be impossible for the American debtor to procure sterling in Geneva. At the same time he may refuse to exercise his right to pay in Swiss francs, though they would be available to him. In this case equity demands that the creditor should be able to insist upon the payment of Swiss francs which, ex hypothesi, the American debtor can pay. This is the situation envisaged by Article 2. We deal only with the case in which the debtor in fact alleges impossibility; if he fails to do so and remains silent, there is no reason why the creditor should have any right to change the money of account. Nothing contained in Article 2 is intended to suggest that impossibility would ever be a good defence in the case of a monetary debt or that the debtor could be discharged as a result of impossibility.

10. Article 1 is based upon the fact that in the normal case the creditor does not mind whether he receives the currency to which he is entitled under the contract or the currency of the place of payment. What he is interested in is to ensure that he receives the real equivalent of what is owed to him. He receives that equivalent if he is paid such sum of the moneta loci solutionis as corresponds to the agreed sum according to the rate of exchange at the place and date of payment (Article 3).

11. Article 4 deals with the problems which arise if the debtor fails to pay on the due date and a depreciation of the money of account occurs after such date. The Uniform Laws on Bills of Exchange and Cheques, which were adopted in Geneva in 1930 and 1931 and which, we believe, are now in force in over fifteen countries have solved these problems by conferring upon the creditor the right to payment in the moneta loci solutionis and to choose between the rate of exchange of the date of maturity and that of the date of payment. In our view, the Geneva rules (which, of course, are designed to apply only to the strict obligations arising from negotiable instruments) are in some respect too inflexible to be adopted as a general rule. We have attempted to formulate what we believe are more equitable rules, as appears from the following examples:

- a. £100 is due in Geneva on the 15th September 1949. The debtor can pay £100 or the Swiss franc equivalent as at that date (Article 1 and Article 3). If sterling depreciates before that date the creditor must bear the loss. The Geneva Rules lead to the same result.
- b. £100 is due in Geneva on the 15th September 1949, but is not paid. On the 18th September 1949, the Swiss franc depreciates, so that the rate changes from £1 = S.frs. 18 to £1 = S.frs. 24. Under the Geneva Rules the creditor will be able to obtain £100 or S.frs. 2400. Under our proposals (Article 1 and Article 3) he receives £100.
- c. £100 is due in Geneva on the 15th September 1949, but is not paid. On the 18th September 1949, sterling depreciates, so that the rate falls from £1 = S.frs. 12. Under the Geneva Rules the debtor would have to pay S.frs. 1800. According to our proposals (Article 4) the debtor will likewise have to pay S.frs. 1800, unless he succeeds in proving that his failure to pay arose from 'force majeure' or the default of the creditor or that in the particular circumstances of the case, the creditor is not prejudiced by the delayed payment.

We believe that the exceptions so suggested do not require explanation. They are intended to eliminate the rigidity which characterises the Geneva laws. These rules will apply irrespective of whether the debtor pays in the currency which is due or in the currency of the place of payment. To that extent, therefore, our Draft provides for a measure of revalorisation. This, of course, involves a question of policy. But the solution suggested by us is supported not only by the ideas, underlying the Geneva Conventions on Bills of Exchange and Cheques, but also by such strong considerations of fairness and equity that we do not hesitate in recommending what to some may appear as a substantial change of the law. Our Draft does not prescribe the currency in which the additional sum due under Article 4 will have to be paid. This is a question of minor practical importance, which, in our view, can safely be answered by the Courts. We do not deal with the case in which the money of account appreciates. In that case the debtor is obviously not entitled to any relief, since it is inherent in the nominalistic principle that, irrespective of changes in value, he must pay what he has promised to pay.

12. Article 5 is intended to make it clear that the rules suggested by us do not exclude either party's right to claim such further or other damage or relief as may be recoverable under the appropriate legal system. Thus we do not wish to preclude the creditor from claiming additional damage suffered as a result of the necessity for obtaining credit. It is also conceivable that, if the creditor has refused to accept payment, the debtor may have a remedy against the creditor.

13. Article 6 is the first of a series of provisions dealing with the peculiar difficulties arising in those cases in which proceedings become necessary. These difficulties exist mainly in the Anglo-American countries by reason of the fact that, in these countries, the plaintiff cannot claim and the Court cannot award any sum of money other than a sum of moneta fori. Article 6 and Article 7 propose to abolish this rule by providing that the plaintiff must claim and the Court must, in principle, award the specific amount of foreign currency which is due. The reasons which render the compulsory conversion demanded by the Anglo-American practice unsatisfactory have frequently been explained and need not be repeated by us. If before the judgment the money of account depreciates, the plaintiff is entitled to the rights given to him by Articles 2-5 and can claim accordingly in the proceedings (see Article 6). If the moneta fori depreciates, the plaintiff is protected as a result of the fact that his claim as well as the judgment is primarily expressed in terms of the money of account.

14. It is clear, however, that, after the plaintiff has recovered judgment in the money of account due to him, conversion into the moneta fori may become inevitable. Thus a bailiff who is charged to enforce the judgment must be put into a position in which he can take from the debtor the appropriate amount of moneta fori. The Committee believes that sufficient guidance is given by the provision in Article 7 according to which the Court will be able to give the defendant the right of paying in the moneta fori at the rate of exchange of the date of payment. This is in accordance with the practice prevailing in a number of countries.

15. It remains to deal with the case in which the money of account depreciates between judgment and satisfaction. We are of the opinion that the authorities in charge of the execution of a judgment cannot be entrusted with the decision whether, and to what extent, the plaintiff is, in such circumstances, entitled to relief. Fresh proceedings may, therefore, be necessary in the course of which the plaintiff will be entitled to make a claim in accordance with Article 4. The proposed Article 8 is merely intended to make it clear that any such further claim is not precluded by the existence of a judgment.

16. It is also obvious that special rules have to be laid down to deal with the case of bankruptcy proceedings or other proceedings involving the distribution of a fund. The reason is that in order to permit distribution of the fund all claims must be converted on a uniform basis. Your Committee does not think that these problems can usefully be dealt with within the framework of the present draft Convention, which is of a limited character. For the time being these problems will have to be solved on a national basis.

17. Article 9 expresses a rule which, we believe, has not been questioned on the Continent, where claims for damages are treated as monetary obligations. This is not altogether the position in England or, probably, in the United States of America. In these countries damages appear to be payable in sterling and dollars respectively, and, if an item of damage has arisen in another currency, the amount has to be converted into the moneta fori. We propose the abolition of this rule (Article 9).

18. The words "place of payment" are ambiguous in that they may contemplate the place where payment ought to be made or the place where payment is in fact made. Article 10 suggests that the expression should be given the former meaning.

19. We have not found it easy to define the appropriate type of rate of exchange which should be employed wherever a process of conversion becomes necessary. Very many different types of rates of exchange exist and so large a variety of circumstances have to be considered that it would be dangerous to lay down too inflexible a rule. After much reflection and discussion we suggest in Article 11 a rule which, we hope, will be found adequate in practice and which is intended to leave to the national law the possibility of defining the rate more closely (middle rate, etc.).

20. We realise that a convention on the payment of foreign money liabilities could deal with numerous further questions which our Draft ignores. Our reasons for limiting the field covered by the draft Convention are twofold. In the first place, we feel that too ambitious a scheme could prejudice the chance of a convention derived from the International Law Association's Draft being put forward and adopted by States. Secondly, many of the problems disregarded by our Draft do not readily lend themselves to statutory regulation. This applies, for instance, to the whole field of the determination of the money of account, where the variety of circumstances and the need for flexibility are such as to render statutory regulation impossible or at least unsatisfactory. However, we are convinced that, even within the limited field covered by our Draft, uniform legislation would be of considerable importance, for we are not aware of any legal system which has entirely satisfactorily solved all the problems considered by our Draft, and, while we do not by any means put it forward as an altogether ideal solution, we hope that it involves some progress.
