

Recommendation 1253 (1994)¹

Final version

Activities of the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) in 1992 and 1993

Parliamentary Assembly

1. The principal objectives of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) are to foster the conditions for orderly migration throughout the world, to organise the resettlement or voluntary return of refugees, displaced persons and asylum-seekers, and to steer migration as a resource for social and economic development. IOM pursues these objectives in close collaboration with its fifty-two member states and forty observer states. It acts in partnership with the United Nations system, other intergovernmental bodies and non-governmental organisations.
2. Since it was set up in 1951, IOM has organised the transfer of over five million migrants and refugees, some 80% of them under humanitarian programmes, the remainder under programmes for the transfer of qualified human resources or national migrants. Almost one million people were moved by IOM in 1992 and 1993 alone, the overwhelming majority for humanitarian reasons, including refugees, internally displaced persons, returnees and individuals under special programmes, for example for the urgent medical treatment of victims of the war in the former Yugoslavia or the evacuation of third country nationals caught in the conflict in Yemen.
3. Recognising that international migration is an important factor in social and economic development, IOM has pioneered "migration for development" programmes to help developing countries meet their need for highly skilled labour. Since 1964, IOM has arranged for the transfer of over 42 000 highly qualified specialists and technicians, many returning to their own countries after acquiring their expertise abroad.
4. In seeking to establish a framework for the regulation of unbalanced, haphazard migration flows, IOM favours a comprehensive approach, convinced that international development aid should be directed to migration-producing countries, that information campaigns should be conducted in those countries to dispel illusions about opportunities elsewhere, that government migration services should be strengthened, that migration policies should correspond more closely to reality, and that greater support should be given to the return of migrants to their home countries.
5. In recent years, IOM has made a particular effort to build up its capacity to provide migration services in the countries of central and eastern Europe, in recognition of the particular migration problems and needs of these countries and of their potential for disorderly migration flows. The emphasis has been on migration management training, advice on legislative reform, research, and information campaigns designed to correct would-be migrants' unrealistic expectations.
6. Maintaining funding for these tasks is a major challenge for IOM, whose operational budget is financed by voluntary contributions from governmental sources, from migrants themselves or their sponsors, and whose administrative budget is funded by its member states on a proportional basis.
