Exchange Control

Motion for a recommendation

tabled by Mr R.W.G. MACKAY and other members of the Assembly

Explanatory Memorandum

The removal of exchange control constitutes one of the most important provisions of the scheme outlined below. It does not necessarily follow from the establishment of a uniform currency. It is essential, however, that the establishment of a uniform currency should be supplemented by ensuring its free circulation over the entire currency area, at any rate for the purposes of current transactions. When it comes to capital transactions there is justification for retaining a certain amount of control in order to avoid unwanted shifting of funds for economic or political reasons. This matter will be dealt with in a separate project concerning the establishment of a European Loans Council.

European notes will circulate freely between participating countries, but it is not proposed that trade deficits should be settled by means of the large-scale exporting of such notes. To do so might result in drastic deflation in deficit countries and equally inconvenient inflation in surplus countries. Even though this would go a long way towards correcting any existing disequilibrium of prices between them, there are strong objections to the application of such method of automatic adjustment. In many instances a trade surplus or deficit cannot be attributed to disequilibrium between the average price levels or even to disequilibrium between the price levels of goods entering into foreign trade between the countries concerned. In such instances the operation of the automatic system would not correct the cause of the difficulties. Its correction must be undertaken either through the granting of loans under the Loans Council scheme or through the planning of foreign trade under the scheme providing for the removal of trade barriers.

While the ultimate aim should be a complete removal of exchange restrictions, not only between the participating countries but also between the European currency area and other countries, it may take some time before this end could be achieved. In order to prevent an unwanted outflow of capital or excessive imports of luxuries from outside the European currency area it will be necessary to maintain exchange control in relation to outside countries. It is essential that the rules relating to exchange control should be unified. It may take some time before it could be ascertained what rules would meet the requirements of Europe as a whole in the changed circumstances. Pending the elaboration of an ultimate system of exchange control it would be advisable to extend the application of restrictions operating in the United Kingdom and the Sterling area. It is generally admitted that these rules are operating very efficiently and, since they are already applied to a large number of countries, their extension over Europe would be easier than the change of the system in the countries in which the British exchange control is in operation.
